NYSE Listing Reduces Volatility, Execution Costs and Intermediary Profitability Study Companies Moving Their Stock to the NYSE from Nasdaq Trade More Efficiently

NEW YORK, Feb. 9, 2006 Volatility, execution costs, intermediary profitability and average quoted spreads are dramatically lower on the New York Stock Exchange than at Nasdaq, according to an updated NYSE study that examined 67 companies that transferred to the NYSE from Nasdaq between 2002-2005.

Updating a 2003 study that compared the market quality for 39 companies, which transferred from the Nasdaq to the NYSE in 2002 and 2003, the updated and expanded study measures the intra-day volatility for the 67 companies that moved from Nasdaq to the NYSE between 2002-2005. It found that price volatility and average execution costs were reduced by more than a third after the companies moved to the NYSE, and that average quoted spreads were 46% lower on the NYSE. Key findings include:

Average intraday volatility measured in five-minute intervals decreased by 34% on average for the 67 companies following their transfers to the NYSE.

Average execution costs incurred by institutions and individual investors measured by the effective spread in accordance with SEC Rule 11Ac1-5 decreased by 38%. Using data three months before and after each transfer, the effective spreads of the 67 stocks averaged 5.43 cents (25.36 bp) on the NYSE compared to 8.74 cents (34.96 bp) on Nasdaq.

Intermediary profitability decreased significantly on the NYSE. On average, financial intermediaries such as market makers earned 4 cents (14 bp) per share on Nasdaq. Once on the NYSE, the per-share intermediary profitability fell to 0.2 cents (2bp). Again, this was calculated using SEC 11Ac1-5 data, on realized spreads.

Average quoted spreads were 46% lower on the NYSE.

Companies that transferred their listings from Nasdaq to the NYSE between 2002 to 2005 have benefited from substantial increases in quality of trading in their stocks, said NYSE Chief Economist Paul Bennett, co-author of the study. These findings show that the NYSE provides the better market for companies, which directly benefits investors.

Reducing price volatility is important for companies because it lowers their cost of capital. Lower volatility also translates into savings for investors who would otherwise be buying and selling stocks at unnecessary high or low prices. The update of the original study was conducted on the stocks of 67 companies that voluntarily transferred from January 2002 to December 2005, comparing the market quality of these stocks two months before and two months after the listing transfer. The original, 2003 study and research methodology will be published in the forthcoming Journal of Financial Markets (Vol. 9, No. 1 of the Journal of Financial Market, pp 49-78).
