TODD JONES AND CARL HESS

Meet the Proposed Leadership Video

CARL HESS: Carl Hess, parts unknown, occasionally in New York.

TODD JONES: Todd Jones, based out of New York.

CARL HESS: Todd, what brought you to Willis?

TODD JONES: Good question, Carl. So in 2003, I was with a competing firm and had the opportunity to join Willis and be part of sort of a small group of people, some of which were already at Willis and some of which were new and joining the firm to build a business. How about from your perspective? What brought you into Towers?

CARL HESS: In 1989, you're a young budding consultant. And your boss walks into your office and says I'm going over to the Wyatt Company. You want to stay or fight me for the clients, or come with me? And 26 years later, I guess I went with him.

TODD JONES: So Carl, why are you excited about this merger?

CARL HESS: There are great things ahead of us, right? I mean, we've got now an incredible client base, bringing the two firms together, and we've got an incredible range of things that we can help our clients with. I mean, that's just a very powerful combination.

Todd, clearly there are going to be challenges. What do you see as sort of the big ones, and what are we going to do about it?

TODD JONES: The biggest one is about how we get the organizations actually working together. How do we create or harmonize how we're going to approach clients? Acknowledging that there may be differences in terms of how we run businesses, how we think about interacting with clients. But we need to have a face externally of a very joined, very integrated, and collaborative firm.

CARL HESS: I think the complementary worry I have is around focus, right? I mean, we're both running highly successful businesses. And we've got to make sure we continue to run those with all the success we're having today while building for tomorrow.

TODD JONES: So Carl, what are some of the things people should know about you as a leader?

CARL HESS: I'm a big believer in a long leash, right? It's not a no-leash environment. I think we all have boundaries and structures to some degree. But we have a bunch of smart people in these organizations today, and you don't tell them what to do. You empower them so they can succeed.

TODD JONES: If I sort of had to describe my leadership style, how would you define your leadership style? I'd probably say I'm much more comfortable in a servant leadership capacity, that I derive great joy and happiness on witnessing others' success.

So Carl, what would be the one thing about yourself that you'd never want to admit?

CARL HESS: This is the truth, I am horribly shy. I am a fundamentally antisocial person.

TODD JONES: Well, you hide it well.

CARL HESS: Todd, I need your deepest secret here.

TODD JONES: I think—and this may come as a surprise to you, because I get this question a lot—is this my real hair? And people are surprised to hear that yes, that this is actually my real hair. So Carl, what makes you laugh?

CARL HESS: Why Todd, you make me laugh.

TODD JONES: Carl, you're never going to believe this. You make me laugh.

CARL HESS: This is a marriage made heaven.

TODD JONES: This is beautiful.
