Valeant's market share presentation of its dermatology product Acanya is misleading and incomplete as it deliberately excludes ACZONE

Valeant's presentation showed market share data for products within their direct competitive categories, which is standard in the industry, consistent with our past practice, and consistent with slide 38 of our May 28th presentation. With respect to Valeant's presentation of Acanya's market share, Valeant compared Acanya to other similar products in the antibiotic + BPO combination category. Aczone, as a single-agent antibiotic, is complementary to Valeant's acne portfolio.

Valeant made contradicting statements about the facial injectables business sold to Galderma and its potential impact on guidance

Valeant's initial 2014 budget projected that the injectables business would achieve $230M in revenue and $0.41 of Cash EPS in the second half of 2014. This budget included significant growth driven by significant expansion in Valeant's injectables sales force and the full impact of a full year of the MVP program, as highlighted on Valeant's January 2014 guidance call. Valeant expected to increase the number of sales professionals selling injectable products from fewer than 100 at the end of 2013 to more than 180 sales professionals by the beginning of the second half of 2014.

The realized impact of the injectables divestiture on second half earnings per share was $.50, or $.09 greater than Valeant's initial 2014 budgeted projection of the segment's earnings contribution. This $.09 increased impact is the result of:

Maintaining a number of aesthetics employees that were not transferred to Galderma:

While the majority of the US injectables sales staff was transferred to Galderma, a number of commercial employees were retained including employees with responsibilities at Solta and Obagi, Valeant retained 60% of US aesthetics' commercial employees.

The Canadian sales team was only partially transferred to Galderma. Staff was retained to continue promoting Obagi, Solta, and other aesthetic products that were promoted across the entire sales team.

Outside of North America, no employees were transferred with the sale.

Stranded corporate costs

No non-commercial employees were transferred with the sale of the business, and all were retained.

Stranded business unit costs & continued industry spending

Training, medical affairs, regulatory, practice management, and business unit management all were retained.

Valeant has continued to maintain the same level of spending at industry meetings to retain its market presence in anticipation of the Allergan merger.

Valeant has maintained its professional outreach within aesthetics despite the injectables divestiture

MVP infrastructure

Valeant is maintaining MVP infrastructure for the remainder of 2014

As mentioned in April our aesthetics infrastructure was part of the $2.7B in synergies from the combined company, and the full value of these synergies will be captured once the Allergan deal is completed.

Overall we received a significant valuation of 4.5-5x sales on a trailing basis, which given the announced sale of the business and the potential business risks associated with the announced merger we determined there was greater risk in waiting to sell the business than accepting the Galderma offer. We view the divestiture of our aesthetics business as an opportunity cost of the Allergan transaction. We will be redeploying this capital as part of the Allergan transaction.

Allergan believes that the declining performance of those [injectables] products under Valeant is a striking example of the weaknesses of Valeant's business model of serial acquisitions

For the first five quarters under Valeant's ownership, sales of Valeant's facial injectables products grew at a high single-digit CAGR. In early Q2 2014, three weeks into the sixth quarter of ownership, Valeant announced its intention to sell its injectables business. As management described on Valeant's Q2 earnings call, this announcement disrupted the injectables sales force and caused confusion in the marketplace while at the same time certain competitors took aggressive pricing action resulting in a 40% decline in sales for the quarter. The decline was magnified due to the fact that the business historically does a disproportionate amount of sales in the 2nd quarter of the year and in 3rd month of each quarter, which by this time in Q2 2014 the sales announcement had been made, and the sales force had all received their offers from Galderma.

As disclosed on slide 141 in Valeant's May<sup>12</sup><sup>8</sup> presentation, Valeant has a track record of, not only realizing significant cost synergies at acquired companies, but of accelerating sales growth. Valeant has completed seven platform acquisitions and growth has accelerated at each acquired company under Valeant's ownership. Growth Platforms:

Coria

Dow

Aton

Pharmaswiss & Sanitas

OraPharma

Medicis

Bausch + Lomb

Press Release

Valeant's revised financial outlook validates Allergan's belief that growth is declining at Valeant and that its business model is unsustainable

Valeant included future acquisitions in its guidance, thereby confirming that Valeant does not have sufficient organic

On Valeant's July 31, 2014 earnings conference call, Valeant provided projections for two potential scenarios: a debt repayment scenario and an acquisition scenario.

The debt repayment scenario, which does not include any acquisitions, forecasts high single-digit organic revenue growth. This growth forecast is supported by a detailed business unit level build-up provided in the July 31 presentation. The debt repayment scenario also forecasts Cash EPS growth of 17% in 2015 and 20% in 2016. In addition, in this scenario, net leverage declines to less than 2.0x EBITDA by 2016.

growth and needs to rely on acquisitions

The acquisition scenario, assumes acquisitions of ~$5 billion in 2015 and ~$10 billion in 2016. Cash EPS is expected to grow by 24% in 2015 and 35% in 2016, while net leverage is kept at or below 4.0x EBITDA.

Acquisitions have been an important part of Valeant's value creation strategy. Management believes it is useful for investors to have a forecast of how Valeant will grow if it is able to continue to acquire businesses in a manner consistent with past experience.

Valeant provided these two cases so that investors could see how Valeant's business will differ as a result of different capital allocation decisions. Valeant believes that a mid-case scenario between the debt repayment scenario and the acquisition scenario represents a conservative base case of expected performance for the company.

Price continues to be the main growth driver for Valeant

Pharmaceutical companies, including Allergan and Valeant, grow from a combination of price and volume increases. Valeant has disclosed that over 90% of Bausch + Lomb's growth is attributable to volume increases. In fact, for the majority of Valeant's businesses, growth is driven predominately by volume, specifically:

Emerging Markets, Surgical, Contact Lens, Consumer Health, and Ophthalmology Pharmaceuticals growth is driven predominantly by volume

Promoted Pharmaceutical brands (i.e., Dermatology, Dental) are growing from a combination of price and volume

Tail Products growth is driven predominantly by price

Valeant acknowledged that its artificially low tax rate is unsustainable in the absence of acquisitions

Valeant's tax rate could increase slightly if Valeant were to stop making acquisitions and instead used cash flow to pay down debt. Even in this scenario, Valeant anticipates that its tax rate will remain in the single-digit range for the foreseeable future.

Valeant has also reviewed how tax reform proposals currently being debated in Congress may impact the company. Management estimates that even if the most aggressive proposed rule changes were enacted, Valeant would expect no material impact in the next two years and would estimate a zero to three percent increase in Valeant's effective tax rate in the longer term.

The Company is regularly subject to audits as are most companies of our size.

Press Release

Valeant refuses to update its synergy forecasts for Allergan despite acknowledging that it would support several of Allergan's initiatives, making it highly unlikely that Valeant will realize its purported $2.7 billion synergy assumption

Valeant expects to achieve $2.7 billion in cost synergies from the combined Allergan Valeant business. This forecast uses 2014 as the base year for measuring targeted synergies. As explained on Valeant's July 31 earnings call, some of the synergies Valeant expects to achieve could overlap with some of the cost cuts Allergan expects to realize next year. If Allergan achieves these cost cuts, and these cuts were retroactively applied to 2014, this overlap could result in a reduction in Valeant's synergy target by a maximum of $475 million. Allergan's cost reductions, however, would not necessarily be the same reductions targeted by Valeant.

Valeant's integration of Bausch + Lomb serves as a blueprint for the Allergan integration. At the time of the acquisition, Valeant announced targeted synergies of $800 million. Valeant is on track to achieve more than $900 million of synergies. At the same time, Valeant has increased organic growth from 4% to 10%, demonstrating Valeant's ability to generate organic growth and cut costs at the same time.

Allergan's skepticism of Valeant's synergy forecasts underscore their fundamental lack of understanding of Valeant's operating model and should cast doubt on their management team's ability to execute the Valeant-light strategy they announced on July 21, 2014. Allergan's adoption of several key components of Valeant's operating model is powerful validation for Valeant's view of the value-creating potential of combining these two companies as Allergan is limited in the value it can create as a standalone company. Without a merger, Allergan will be unable to eliminate duplicative overhead and sales & marketing expenses, realize revenue synergies, or reduce its tax rate. Valeant's cost discipline, portfolio overlap, and low tax rate, make it an ideal merger partner for Allergan.

Valeant's offer provides a compelling offer to Allergan shareholders, providing for $19.77 or nearly 2 times Allergan's $10.00 Cash EPS guidance in 2016.
