HOW WILL 5G CHANGE EVERYTHING?

Michio Kaku, Physicist and Futurist: I'm a professor of physics, but I'm also a futurist, and I say, "When you think about the future, hold on to your hats. Every once in a while there is this technology which changes the entire landscape—we have a paradigm shift, a game changer. Like, for example, the coming of the printing press with movable type: within just a few years we had almost a million manuscripts circulating throughout Europe. And that set into motion one of the greatest transitions, and that is the Renaissance. A renaissance of knowledge—5G technology should be seen in that light. We're talking about unleashing the floodgates. When you first hear about 5G, you learn that it's maybe a hundred times faster than 4G, and you say to yourself, Great, wow, my favorite movie in just a few seconds, and then you say to yourself, Is that all? I mean just faster downloads, getting a Hollywood movie in a matter of seconds? Is that it? No. I think in the future the internet will be in your contact lens, you'll simply blink and have access to the entire storehouse of knowledge on the planet Earth. There are millions of Americans that do not have easy access to broadband technology, and that's where 5G comes in, because they realize the importance of being connected to the rest of the world. That's a precious commodity: connectedness. Think of what that's going to do to society's productivity, to our interconnectedness, to our job market, to the economy, to enrich and empower our lives.

BUILDING A TRULY CONNECTED WORLD

Grant Castle, VP, Network Technology: I think the thing that gets me most excited is what doesn't exist today. 5G is going to take the best technologies available in the wireless space, put it all together, so that people can create future capabilities, future technologies. And you are going to forget that there's a wireless network behind it. The future is real simple: everything is connected, no speed limits, no usage limits, no limits at all. If that was the future, what would you do with it? You know, what would you do?

ENGINEERING A SAFER WORLD

Muhilan Vamadevan, Principal Engineer, Systems Design: The most exciting thing about 5G is connecting anything and everything. Every decade, there's always—the new technology comes and it changes lives. 5G is definitely one of them. Why? Because you do have billions of sensors, which are able to be connected and which also pave the way for more innovative applications. Today we could have a flood-abatement system which will direct—if there's something wrong—before it floods. Now with this connected world, we would be warned before certain national disasters happen, and we could take the necessary actions before these things occur, and it will save thousands and thousands of lives.

CREATING AN IMMERSIVE WORLD

Grant Castle, VP, Network Technology: The future is not in your basement on the TV. One of the most powerful games I've ever played with my kids was Pokémon Go. But Pokémon Go is like the Swiss Army knife with the small blade. What if we took that experience and blew it way up, right? What if you could go experience the world in a fully rendered, augmented reality perspective? It's much more expansive, it's much more engaging, and, you know, you're out there with your kids, and you're in it. And you're not in it with just your kids. You're in it with your neighbors and your friends and the rest of the world, together. That's compelling. Your future is outside, right, your future is mobile. And that's what we really want to enable.
